The most frequent criticism of the Englishman made by men of many countries, turns on his frigidity and rigidity, a criticism that surprises the Englishman because he is not aware of anything that justifies it. His exterior reserve often gives an impression of a cold temperament, and no indication of the rich warm character that it covers. Far from being rigid and stiff, he is highly emotional, and at the same time ashamed of showing emotion. He is extremely sensitive, but his education has taught him that to be too sensitive is to be weak.

He is naturally warm- hearted and at the same time afraid of what he thinks vulgarity of exuberance. He wants to be liked, but will never show that he wants to be liked. He is sentimental but will not admit to being guided by sentiment, and so he goes about in armour, and in the presence of strangers, he rarely relaxes and lays it aside. When he does eventually lay aside his armour, then you meet the real Englishman, genial, generous and sympathetically adaptable. He does not like the men of some warmer countries, gives his friendship freely to all who come along, but when he does give it, he gives it with all his heart.
